Mrs. Siddons at Deary Lane.

In 1775, when Mrs. Siddons was playing at Cheltenham, Garrick, to whont, Lord Bruce had praised her highly seen King down to see her. He reported favorably; and Garrick, just then nearly worried to death by Mrs. Yates, Mrs. Abington and Miss Younge, offered her an engagement at £5 a week. She was delighted, and confident of success, though she did not admit that she felt so sutil long afterward. She made her first appearance in a spectacular piece, representing Shakespearean characters, called the " Jubilee," and Garrick inflamed the wratis of the rival actresses against her by giving her the part of Venus. Little Thomas Dibdin played Copid; and it was characteristic of her collectedness and strict attention to her business, that she kept himsmiling by whispered promises of hou-bous. Garrick paid her marked attention, and shielded her with all his power from the "histrionic viragoes, her position along whom was enough to chill any heart." They tried to prevent the audience seeing her, by getting before her on the stage; but Garrick took care to bring her well down to the front. It is not pessible to impute blame to Garrick in the events which ensued, or to hold Mrs. Siddons guiltless of unmerited bitterness and spite toward him. She played Portio, was nervous, awkward, inaudible, and illdressed, and was not a success. She played Julia, and was a decided failure. Garrick seems to have been ignorant of her tragic powers, and persisted in putting her into comedy parts. She never was a comedian. Garrick was now giving his farewell performances, and he gave her an opening in a tragic part-Lody Anno-a selection which was indeed an honor, "On this occasion the great actor surpassed himself. It was admitted to be a performance almost awful for its savage intensity. The fire of his eye struck perror into the young actress. She forgot his important direction—that she should keep her back to the stage, so that Alls face might be presented to the audience she thought she must have fainted on the -and received such a look of rebuke that spot. She was passed over in silence by all the critics except one, who pronounced her 'lamentable,'" This was her last appearance; and the unfortunate circumstances of the brief engagement filled her with misplaced and unmerited wrath and bitterness toward Garrick, unworthy of her and injurious to her m Mrs. Siddons has told the story of her reappearance on the scene of her former failure with much simplicity and modesty. She had set herself to confute the verifiet she knew to be unjust by sheer drudgery, and she did it, at the cost of tremendous toil-dreadful days and nights of terror and suspense. She had much to depress, and little to encourage her, but one eircumstance offered a good omen. She was to play Isabella; and her little boy, who was to be her child in the piece, was so affected by her acting at rehearsal, that he took the whole for reality, and burst into the most passionate floods of tears, thinking he was about to loose his mamma, This satisfactory proof of effect deeply impressed the actors and managers, and Sheridan had the story conveyed to friend-

Her first appearance was on the 10th of October, 1782. Roger Kemble came to town to be, as she says, "a witness of her trial." He accompanied her to her dress-ly newspapers.

"I was," she says, "in one of what I call my desperate tranquillities, which usually impress me under terrific eircumstances, and completed my dress, to the astonish ment of my attendants, without uttering one word, though often sighing most profoundly." All the world knows the story of that great triumph, how she took entire possession of her vast audience, how the exquisite sweetness of her tones went to every heart, how men wept, and women went into hysteries, and how the passionate bursts of applause interrupted every speech of hers in the last act. Her soven years' training had had its fruit; and the hard-working woman, with her intense sense of duty, her deep-rooted maternal instincts, and her matter-of-fact industry, deserved it well. This is her own account of the home-scene that night: "I reached my own quiet fireside, on retiring from the scene of reiterated shouts and plandits. I was half dead, and my joy and thankfulness were of too solemn and overpowering a nature to admit of words, or even tears. My father, my husband, and myself sat down to a frugal, neat supper, in a silence uninterrupted, except xelamations of gladuess from Mr. Siddons. My father enjoyed his refreshments, but occasionally stopped short, and lay-ing down his knife and fork, lifted up his venerable face, and throwing back his silvery hair, gave way to tears of happiness. We soon parted for the night; and I, worn out with continually broken rest and laborious exertion, after an hour's retrospection, (who can conceive the intenseness of that reverie?) fell into a sweet and profound sleep, which lasted to the middle of the next day. I arose, alers in mind and body." The letters the great actress wrote at this time do her disposition as much honor as all the world of London was doing her genius. Fame and money came to her rapidly. Her first short season brought her £1,500. All the great world flocked to call on her. The King and the royal family took a deep Queen put her son's name down on her list for the Charter-house, and Hamilton painted her picture, which all the world flocked to see and weep before. After eighty nights' wailing, mourning and raging in every phase of histrionic affliction, the actress London season closed.—The
